Schrock Tells Of Early Days Of Appomattox

A village — a county — and a river. All named "Appomattox", and all three the subject of a talk before the Daughters of the American Revolution by Duane Schrock, member of the Interpretative Staff, Appomattox Court House National Historical Park.

Schrock spoke also to the P-TA of Appomattox Elementary School telling both gatherings that the Appomattox Indians, for which the village, county, and river were named, were a part of the Powhatan Confederation. At times, he said the Appomattox Indians had a village about one mile from the mouth of the Appomattox River. It is believed that they came into the area to hunt.

Schrock traced the beginning of white settlement in this area to 1705 when land grants were offered at five shillings for 50 acres. (About 10 to 70 cents for 50 acres.) Tobacco a major crop in the old days, he said, plus the very necessary "grist mill". "There's nothing modern about 'do it yourself'," said Schrock, speaking of the handiness and resourcefulness of these pioneers

Stage Coaches and Clover Hill

Two brothers, Alexander and Lilbourne Patteson brought the Richmond - Lynchburg Stage Line to what was later to become the old village of Appomattox Court House. They extended the stage line in 1811, then built Clover Hill Tavern in 1819, which is still standing.

Appomattox County was formed in 1835 from Prince Edward, Charlotte, Buckingham, and Campbell counties, largely because farmers had to go so far to transact legal matters, Schrock said.

Tale of Two Cats

Schrock told of a contest between Auburn and Joe Sweeney, famed banjo player of Appomattox. Sweeney was "undisputed winner" said Schrock. He played a guitar with his hands and his banjo with his feet.

Sweeney, credited with adding the fifth string to the banjo, killed a family cat to make his first banjo. When his mother threw his creation in the fire, Sweeney made another, but not before the family's grey cat had "disappeared" only to provide a "cat-hide" for his instrument.

Sweeney died in 1859, and his brother, Sam, achieved fame by playing for Southern troops during the War Between th eStates.

Clash in 1861

"The clash between North and South came in '61", said Schrock and Appomattox sent boys to become the 20th Battalion of Heavy Artillery, "The Appomattox Invincibles."

Schrock said that Joel W. Flood, was the first captain of Co. H Second Virginia Cavalry.

Schrock quoted R. S. Henry in his description of Reconstruction Days as a "long, drawn-out tragedy of misunderstanding."

1894 Ball Game

Schrock descrined a Farmville train excursion to Appomattox which took plac ein 1894. Pamplin won a ball game against Farmville, 8 to 2, said Schrock

Old Bricks and $25

The "new Court House in present day Appomattox was a made in part from 70,000 bricks from the Old Court House which burned in 1894. Two men did the work, and each one received $25.60 for his work.

"Appomattox, famous throughout the world, has given its young men to many causes, said Schrock. "Appomattox which helped the nation unite, has helped keep our nation indivisible.
